

Four robots on an abandoned island start to rebuild it as a single estate. They wordlessly clear away brush and note the various smells of the indigenous flowers that will have to comprise their garden. From behind some weeds, a lily surprises them— the smell of one lily erases all functions except for the one that helps choose colors, replacing their mission to rebuild with a short-circuit of whispered poems:

They shudder silently at the couplets and turn their backs on the buildings to inhabit the garden, passing branches; a twig of apple blossom. A stem of clover offered as response in this full language, limited nonetheless to the phases of love. I hope they will be happy.
